A bit about Mary

Mary has contributed to Australia's healthcare system reform in a variety of executive and leadership roles over the last 30 years. She has worked closely with health improvement leaders in many countries across the world to bring about global improvements to our health and social care systems.

Mary has held positions with national government and not-for-profit health care and social welfare services, including women's and community health services, the Department of the Premier and Cabinet in South Australia, Aboriginal Affairs and Reconciliation and Health Workforce Australia.

Mary is committed to bringing compassion and creativity into every space she works in.

A bit about Angie

Angie's career has focused on providing strategic health system, performance, operational and financial leadership. This leadership has primarily been delivered across sectors and organisations that are undergoing rapid change and reform.

Angie has always been interested in humans. Of late, she has been particularly interested in how we bring humanity back into healthcare settings. Those simple moments that change our understanding of ourselves and each other in order to bring about beautiful experiences in the most vulnerable of times.

As a healthcare leader Angie values the feelings and outcomes of working in relational ways and gains strength in the collective. Beyond her professional career she is a granddaughter, daughter, sister, wife and mum.

She currently holds an executive role at the Institute for Urban Indigenous Health.
